In case of table, figure, chart or picture citation, the citation should be given as "e.g.: Source: Cloninger, 2009: 4". Both tables and figures are identified with Arabic numerals, followed with a very brief one-line descriptive title (about 10 words).

CALL FOR CHAPTERS

In today's world, which is called digitalization or technological era, our life practices, habits and ways of doing business continue to change their shells day by day. Perhaps we are witnessing a period in which the concepts of time and space become difficult and complicated, as the subject of a world that is running away. Topics such as artificial intelligence, internet of things, innovation, augmented reality, cloud computing, and cybersecurity have become part of our daily lives. Moreover, more than half of the 7.5 billion world population use the internet, and two out of every three adults have mobile phones. People shop digitally, watch the movie or TV show in their native language, plan a vacation and play games. AI lives and moves with big data, learning machines, and new robot technologies.

Our digitalized social life carries with it the convenience of accessing data and reaching information, as well as the concern of data pollution and insecurity. Concerns about robotization, Humanity 2.0, surveillance society, and human enslavement are often voiced in future planning and lead to different debates about the nature of human-system interaction. Moreover, rather than where it is in the world, what is done and how it is made important and it is a reality to make the effects of digitalization, which has leaked into every area of our lives and become invisible by being ordinary, on our social life.

Within the framework of this perspective, the views of our digitalized life, which vary from technology to production processes, from socialization to our consumption understanding, will be discussed and published as a book based on the following topics.

- Digital Identity and Digital Culture,
- Digital Technology and Social Transformations,
- Surveillance Society and Privacy,
- Data Brokers and Digital Traces,
- Digital Strategy and Policies,
- Crypto Money and Digital Economies,
- Industry 4.0, Society 5.0,
- Biotechnology and Artificial Intelligence,
- Dataism and Hypnotic Society,
- Digital Turkey and Globalization
- The Future of Digital Life

We invite researchers studying in the field of law and social sciences, and interested in the subject to contribute to the international study prepared for this purpose. Thank you in advance for your cooperation and contributions and wish you success in your works.
